A workspace is a location where an employee or customer has access to documents, files, and information for a particular undertaking. A workspace can be a physical or virtual location, and an employee or customer can access the workspace using various devices, including a computer, smart phone, tablet, or any other type of device. One example of a workspace is a company computer that an employee can access to create and edit computer files. Smartphones and tablets are examples of devices that an employee or customer can use to access or create a workspace. A workspace can be a particular set of locations, devices, and applications that support an employee or customer, or a project. For example, a workplace environment can include locations where an employee or customer can read and print reports for a particular project. The locations can be physical, such as a table or a desk. The locations can also include virtual resources, such as a virtual application or desktop. The workspace can be divided up into logical groups or components. Logical groups are pieces of a workspace. Components are logical groups within a workspace. For example, a workplace may include the following three components: 1. A console component. The console component provides access to a virtual desktop for the employee or customer, and may provide access to virtual application such as a word processing application. 2. A presentation component. The presentation component provides the ability to create and edit presentations. The presentation component may also provide access to a virtual desktop. For example, the presentation component may include a virtual presentation application, a virtual desktop, a virtual presentation application, and a virtual presentation desktop. 3. A spreadsheet component. The spreadsheet component provides access to spreadsheets that include information. Component Groups For example, the above example includes a desktop application, a presentation application, a spreadsheet application, and a virtual desktop environment. The components include a logical group called a presentation component. The presentation component includes a logical group called a spreadsheet component. The spreadsheet component includes a logical group called a presentation component. The presentation component includes a logical group called a desktop application. A workspace may be customized and configured for each employee or customer. For example, a workplace may include customized logos and other design elements for the benefit of a particular employee or customer. For example, a particular customer may prefer having information that is different than another customer, or that otherwise is not available to other customers.
